The shift of economic supremacy to the East, unprecedented rates of urban migration and burgeoning demographics has resulted in the rise of megacities within the context of emerging economies.

With accelerated, unsustainable urbanization weighing heavily on global resources, there is a need to move away from object-centric to people centred paradigms for the city and the urban community.

A stronger ethical conscience, riding on the reach of social media, is resurging across global boundaries, creating a renewed belief in architecture with a social purpose.

What then is Architecture's role to envision, facilitate and manage such scales of urbanization to shape the physical and social fabric of the city?

What must the Architect do as a leader in paving the way towards the Future Communities of the world?
